EGBERT'S INSPIRATION

THE knock on the door was sharp and imperative. Egbert the Rooster leaped from his chair with a cluck of joy. "He's come. I knew he'd come when he got my letter."

He ran to the door and then, before he slid back the bolts, a touch of caution stopped him. Instead, he called, "Who's there?"

A harsh, rasping voice answered, "Who were you expecting, pea-brain? Shirley Temple?"

Egbert joyously threw open the door. On the step stood a strange rooster, taller than Egbert, with a lean, tough look, sharp eyes and the scars of many battles on his neck. Egbert spread his wings in delight. "You've come. I knew you would. Come right in, Battling Bob."

The strange rooster sauntered in, looking around with a scornful eye. "You're about the dumbest-looking chicken I ever saw, Egbert. I don't know why I do these things but your letter intrigued me. So you've got a fox who keeps yearning for a chicken dinner, eh?"

"That's right," Egbert babbled. "His name is The Count and when he isn't stealing everybody's money, he's chasing us around, trying to invite us to dinner. We're to be the dinner. That's why, when I read in the paper that Battling Bob, the toughest rooster and champion cock-fighter of the world, was near-by, I wrote that letter. I knew you'd be glad to help us chickens by teaching The Count a lesson."

"What do I do, stupid?" growled Battling Bob. "Do I go rap on his door and start mopping up on him when he answers?"

"Oh, no," Egbert giggled. "I'm not as dumb as I look, I hope. I've got everything planned. First I passed the word around that I was expecting my cousin to visit me, Mrs. Fat Hen. Then, just to be sure, I sent The Count a book entitled '27 Ways To Cook Chicken.' When he reads that and hears about my fat cousin, he'll come galloping over here for a feast. You just wait and see. I'm not so stupid after all, am I?"

Before Battling Bob could answer, there was a knock at the door and the silky voice of The Count called, "Oh, Egbert, my plump little friend, open the door for your affectionate and hungr . . . er—lonely pal, The Count. I hear you have company I'm simply starv . . . I mean, dying to meet."

"Oh, no," Egbert called back, winking at Battling Bob. "I know your tricks, you old Count, you. You can't come in—even if I did sort of forget to lock my front door after my company arrived."

"Is that so?" roared The Count in his natural voice. "Thanks for telling me, dough-brain."

With a crash, the front door burst open and The Count bounded in, licking his chops. "You know what I'm going to do with you, Egg-Head—I mean, Egbert? I'm going to cook you all twenty-seven ways."

Then his eyes fell on Battling Bob. That rooster strutted out in front of Egbert, his hat shoved on one side. "And I'm going to stitch you up one side and pink your seams, you no-account Count. I'll put you down for the long count."

With a shriek of battle joy, Battling Bob shot into the air, clicked his long spurs together twice and landed on the head of the horrified Count. There was a blur of action, the flash of deadly spurs and a whirlwind of fox hair flying through the air. The Count emitted a howl of fright and anguish. He tried to flee, slipped on Egbert's freshly waxed floor and went slamming into the wall instead.

Then he was up, wailing and yowling, and out the door like a flash, shedding bunches of hair in his mad flight through the woods to the safety of his own shack. Egbert rolled on the floor, convulsed with laughter. "Did you ever see anything so funny in your life? It will be a long time before The Count thinks of chicken for dinner again. Everything worked out perfectly. Now I'll bet you don't think I'm so dumb."

"I'll bet I do," Battling Bob growled disgustedly. "You're even dumber. Suppose I hadn't gotten your letter or decided not to come? You'd already stirred The Count up so he had to have chicken to eat. Where would you be now if I hadn't showed up?"

He stopped then, because Egbert, after one horrified cluck of realization, had keeled over in a faint.
